CLIFTON DANIEL
MANAGING EDITOR

Dear Professor Lederberg:

Thank you for the very interesting suggestion in your letter of December 6 to Turner Catledge, executive editor of The New York Times. We shall take it under consideration.

In the meantime, let me point out that it is not difficult to find the texts in The New York Times. If a text is important enough to be printed in The Times, it is usually printed with a front-page story, and a special box (like the one enclosed) is printed with that story to indicate where the text can be found. These boxes are very easy to spot. If you just look at the front page, you can generally find out what major texts we are publishing.

We hope this tip will be useful to you, and we thank you most warmly for your interest in The New York Times.

Sincerely,

Clifton Daniel
